

About Alan

Alan N. Webber lives in Clifton, IL with his wife of thirty-one years. He has four grown children and three grandchildren.

The son and grandson of former truckers, Alan has spent his entire fifty-four years on the planet in and around the transportation industry. After graduating from high school, he attended the local junior college while immersing himself further in the trucking business.

There is no task in the transportation business Alan hasn't done: from greasing trucks to running the company. His load of transportation experience even includes a two-year stint at being a truck driving man, primarily hauling steel and water heaters.

Currently, he is the president of A.N.Webber, Inc., a family-owned nationwide trucking and logistics firm based in Kankakee, IL. They operate two hundred trucks and have terminals in four states.

Whipping Post is Alan's first venture into the writer's world of publication. Much like John Grisham writes a fictional story wrapped around the legal profession, Alan has written a story around the trucking industry, putting a human face behind the big rigs you see — and cuss — going down the highway. This novel is written by a trucker, with over thirty-seven years of daily trucking experience who can put pen to paper; rather than by an author trying to be a trucker for a month from a passenger seat. Alan has works in progress similar to Whipping Post.

Alan hopes you like it . . . his mother did!
